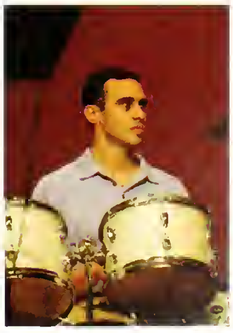
FACULTY



According to their counselors, the Class of 2009 has been highly invested in our school community. You have demonstrated an interest in government and current affairs, commitment to community service, resilience, and lobbied to change school policies concerning headphones and cellphones. You readily volunteered to assist whenever asked. We are proud of you, and know that your experiences at Brookline High School have prepared you for future success.

Congratulations.
Sincerely,
Jackie Browne

As you go through the phases of your life, running across and parallel to the changing times, remember that, throughout history, there have been those that have taken a solid, well-rounded, liberal education and used it to the benefit of themselves and their environment, as well as those who have used the same education to the detriment of both. And then, there are always those who go through life with no idea what to do with it.

Dear young men and women of The Class of 2009,

The Class of '09 is a typical BHS graduating class (not a bad thing).
Perhaps a little bit better. You are the highest achieving class in the proud history of our school, with the highest percentage of National Honor Society members, and the highest MCAS scores. You experienced the election of our nation's first African-American president, and, through your accomplishments and relationships, you reflect President Obama's and Dr. King's dream that we are judged not on the basis of our color, but on our character. And your character, as a Class, is an impressive model for our increasingly pluralistic world.

We will miss you! I will miss you! Please know that BHS is always one of your homes!

THE CITY THAT NEVER SLEEPS

BY MELANIE HUTTNER

My fingers tremble, desperate for salvation, recklessly flicking the lighter. Finally, a spark catches and I exhale a breath that I didn't realize I'd been holding in. The rush of air causes the flame to go out once more. Tears form at the corners of my eyes. I aimlessly try again and again, determined to catch and keep a flame. The cigarette tauntingly oscillates on its pathway to my quivering lips. I finally find my escape.

The music rumbles on in the background, shaking the floor of our eleventh story balcony. The words blend, indecipherable to my ears. Nothing can take my mind off my present situation. The cigarette grows shorter and burns the ends of my fingers. At least the trembling has stopped. Sighing, I head back inside. The festivities will continue on whether or not I'm present, but I'd prefer to not have my house demolished. Young men saunter around; some scout for women to hook up with while others devour the food. One middle aged man, clearly not in control of his body, ambulates over to my slouching frame. His arm feels heavy and out of place around my shoulder as he asks me to dance. I hastily reply "no" and wander away.

I feel a sudden desire to go check on my son. While climbing the stairs, I twist my gold wedding ring back and forth. It has become a nervous habit of mine, ever since my husband was taken away. At times I feel as though it is all I have left of him. The portraits in the stairwell are all posed, with fake smiles ordered by an anxious photographer. But the wedding ring takes me back to his beautiful face as he grinned at me from across the altar. No matter what, I must not let myself forget that image.

Pushing the door open, I view a room filled with books, clothes and gadgets, but with one thing missing: my son.

I glimpse the window, held open by The Catcher and the Rye, and Huck Finn. The last I recall of him with a book was when he was reading The Magic Treehouse series aloud with his father. The jeans strewn on his floor appear altered as well. They look tattered, worn, and two long for the little boy who used to clamber into our room whenever his dreams took a turn for the worse. Opening the window wider, I crawl out, taking in the bright lights and fresh air. The long fire escape looms below me and my breath catches in my throat. There's no sign of him, so I creep back inside, determined to end this prolonged party that I host yearly.

I see him. I see him standing there before me. Oliver smiles at me with a grin like no other. His spirit makes me feel weightless. Our surroundings blur as I see just one thing: him. I stretch my arms forward, reaching for him. Oliver tells me that it'll be alright; he'll navigate through this legal morass and find his way home. I smile back at him. I'm so close to reaching him...now just a few centimeters away. Just like that, he disappears before my eyes. I cry out as my fingers hit the nightstand. My room appears dark, cold and lifeless. Shivering, I curl into a ball and try to remember the last time we lay here together....nineteen long months ago.

Unable to fall back asleep, I tiptoe into Teddy's room. He's back from his night time excursion. He looks okay physically, but as has been the case during these last long months, I have no idea where his mind is. The boy who was once determined to become a lawyer now looks more like a criminal. I trace the outline of stubble on his chin, noting the discolor on the front of his shirt and the tobacco stained finger tips clutching at the blanket. He has developed into an independent young man, but this step forward has resulted with the loss of his innocence. He turns over in his sleep, leaving an open spot by his side. I creep forward, not wanting to disturb his precious and rare hours of sleep.

Now that my son's at my side I try to journey back, with no luck, to the land of dreams. Whenever my eyelids close my heart thumps in my chest and I see him: I relive the last time we spoke, the last time we touched.

"Get your hands off of him!" Teddy shrieks, desperately clawing away from my grasp, forcing his way to his father. The cops ignore my son, continuing on with their job. The light leaves my husband's eyes as they wrap his arms behind him. Tears fly down my checks, blurring my line of sight, but I visualize one thing for sure: my husband mouthing, "I promise, Penny, I didn't do it!"

They push him around. He struggles with them for a while, trying to maintain his dignity, desperate to return to our open arms. The elevator opens and they drag him inside. Teddy and I rush forward, but another officer prevents us from reaching the elevator. The doors close, and just like that, he's gone.

Nineteen months and two trials later he still lies in a cold, eight by eight room with no window. For a crime that he swears by his life he did not commit. No comforting words can appease the sorrow on my son's face. No actions on his part can take us back two years to the happy family we once were.

I step outside for a moment. My fingers tremble, desperate for salvation, recklessly flicking the lighter. Finally a spark catches and I exhale a breath that I didn't realize I'd been holding in. The rush of air causes the flame to go out once more. Tears form at the corners of my eyes. I aimlessly try again and again, determined to catch and keep a flame. The cigarette tauntingly oscillates on its pathway to my quivering lips. I finally find my escape. My release. ◆

DOMESTIC APPLIANCES REBEL

BY ELIAS ANATOLIOS

The sounds of the trailer park were often distracting and usually illegal, and it was best just to ignore them. You could hear people swearing, smashing bottles sometimes and fighting, there was often music, and a fair bit of drunken whooping and hollering. Lying on the bed in the back of the trailer composed principally of pillows and old rolls of paper towels, the sound of shattering glass prompted him only to swear and turn over. He pried open the blinds with his fingers, just to make sure that his car had nothing to do with the sound, but saw only the usual display of empty cans, sleeping bodies heaped upon each other, someone's discarded motorbike sinking into the mud.

Another crash shook the trailer, which was not the most sturdy of structures, and he grabbed the bottle of whiskey (it helped him sleep) by his bed to steady it. Most people at the park were self-medicated to some extent.

Everything was quiet now. The drone of the refrigerator had ceased, causing him to think that maybe there had been a power failure. All the milk would go bad. Drifting in and out of sleep, he considered the implications of life without refrigeration. He would have to hunt. No longer could the most basic of human needs be fulfilled with the twenty-foot expedition he barely had the energy to make as it was. The ease with which it was possible to sustain himself had left him directionless for too long anyway. He would have to hunt.

And then the power came back on. The drone of civilization returned, if somewhat erratically. Very erratically, actually, the sound swelling and diminishing with none of the usual rhythm. It ceased and began again, several times accompanied by another symphony of shattering and scraping. He slid off the futon, stumbling through the door and steadying himself as the sleep drifted off of him like a dense fog. He fell into the bathroom ad splashed some water on his face, his thoughts still churning from the whiskey. Then he shuffled into the kitchen, and raised his eyes to the remains of his kitchen.

The carpeted floor was barely visible under the rubble, a wasteland of shattered glass, bent metal, and sporadic tongues of flame. The mangled cadaver of a cocktail mixer, amidst a small pool of convoluted cutlery rent his eyes. Looking to the corner, he saw that the fridge was gone, its contents strewn across the floor. The milk had spilt, and was lapping at some KFC chicken piled near the counter.

That drone – the fridge – was to be heard off in the distance somewhere behind him, ceasing and starting again, diminishing and swelling, punctuated by the squeaks and scrapes of a very large appliance being dragged upon a plywood flooring.

Someone was stealing his fridge.

As he'd related to himself earlier, the sounds of the park were often illegal, but he'd never heard of anything as big as a fridge being stolen. Usually small things, money. Cigarettes.

The refrigerator slowly opened its freezer door and began to eject frozen entrees at him with the speed and accuracy of homing missiles. He made some attempts to shield his face from the projectile dinners, but a Lean Cuisine found his ribs, and he doubled over. He was unconscious in three minutes, dead in twenty-one, face frozen in the agony of death, arms outstretched and clutching the hairs of the carpet, like Jesus, the contents of his torn body swirling in the milk and KFC chicken. ♦

ESSAY

RECREATIONAL SWIMMING

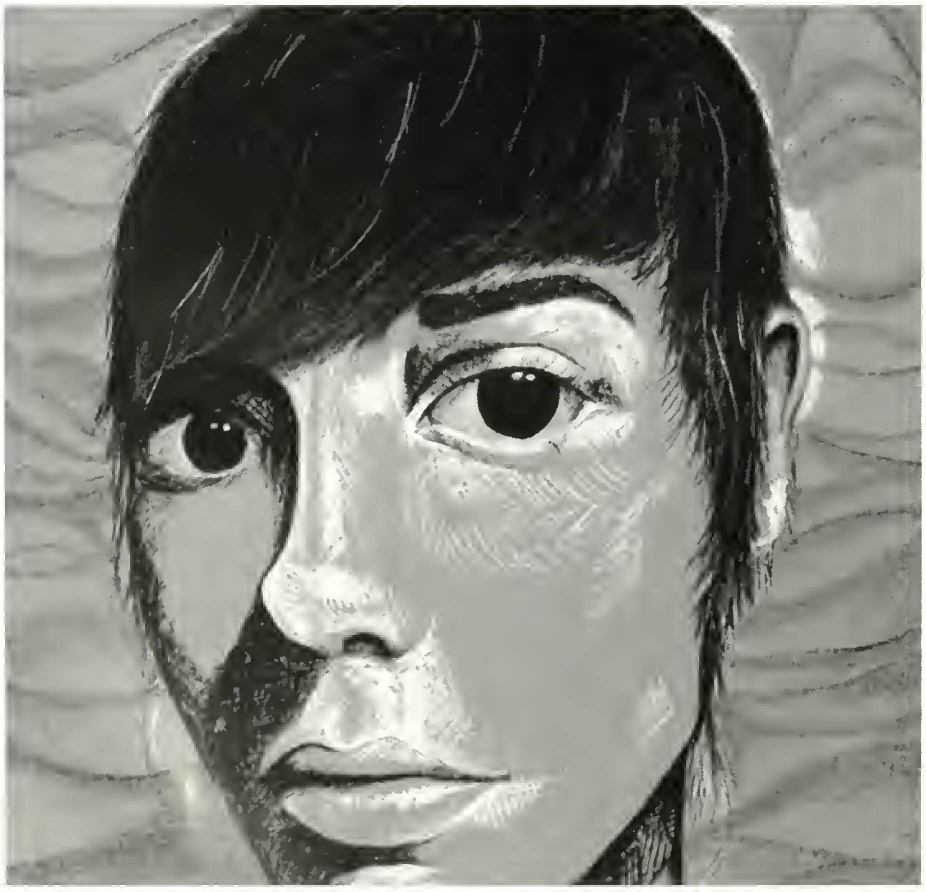
BY DANIEL CHINIARA

Bars line the ceiling, crossing and weaving above everyone's heads. Sunlight can penetrate the building only from side windows wrapping around the indoor pool's boxy frame. The light seeps into the surface of the pool distorted by the ripples of the water. Some beams travel further through the transparent liquid exposing the faded pool bottom.

More waves emerge when young swimmers jump and slide into the water. A twenty year old Asian woman walks out of the building's CPR room to coach the children. The swimmers adjust their swimming goggle straps on their heads and place the frames over their eyes. Girls plunk their swimming caps into the water and flip the latex caps on their heads in one quick motion. Within a few moments, some stragglers wade into the pool from the stairs near the bathrooms. Frowning at her tardy swimmers, the coach briefs her troops like a lieutenant alongside the pool. She taps her pen against her opposite palm like a military baton. Her expressionless face causes the young swimmers to turn to stone when she inspects the swimmer turnout. They stand motionless in the pool until her expression radically alters. Her face overflows with anxiety while she revises the warm-up verbally. Instead of swimming sixteen laps freestyle, the swimmers must only swim twelve. A range of swimmers from five to ten years-old swim form the team, and she must adjust the warm-up depending on their ability.

Once she finishes calling out the warm-up, all the swimmers follow the plan thrashing their arms as they attempt to swim freestyle. A pudgy boy, in Lane 2, smacks the water's surface lifting the water to form a wall that conceals most of his body. He flails his arms in the air and whacks another boy swimming in the opposite direction, who momentarily sinks and bobs up to the surface. The pudgy boy resembles a sea monster with all the chaos that ensues in his wake.

Sarah Brown



Some more skilled swimmers pass the unwieldy swimmer successfully without any harm to them. A slightly pudgy boy slows down—disheartened—to let the more skilled swimmers pass on his left. When the team members stop and take a break, the defeated child shakes his head in disbelief. He glares straight at all the swimmers that passed him. The team only is a recreational program, but how does the organization benefit this swimmer? The coach stands a few lanes over, not paying any attention to the boy. Why must the pool like society acknowledge the strong as the weak suffer? Like the coach, we acknowledge our successes before we fix our faults.

The panting swimmers huddle to hear the next workout, and the short coach barks orders in a clear, unwearied voice. The swimmers follow obediently, commencing butterfly. The smaller ones flap their hands like young birds that begin flight, but nothing happens. The youngest swimmers, in Lane 1, flap less and less. Some swallow water as they dunk their heads. They hastily resurface and gasp for air. We lack the potential of birds. If we possessed the ability to fly, what good would it do if the ceiling sheltering the pool blocks our ascension?

The sound of the swimmers slapping the water continues to resonate throughout the pool until the cool-down ends. The young kids immediately scramble out of the water. Children as young as five and as old as ten push and shove each other. All the young swimmers attempt to get into the locker-rooms first and make use of the few showers there. The sound echoing of girls screaming and hands slipping throughout the pool area catches the attention of the eleven to fifteen year-old swimmers entering from the locker-rooms. Within a few minutes, the older swimmers leap into the pool to commence their high intensity workout. Just as the younger children suffer, the older kid's frustration, in the pool, never ends. ♦

The BHS Green Committee has led the movement for environmentally conscious and resource-saving materials in the BHS cafeteria.

By Vicky Kim and Emma Murphy
Staff Writers

The BHS Green Committee began the new year with an overhaul of the cafeteria intended to reduce waste.

The Committee kicked off their Green Café project on Jan. 5 after several months of planning. Changes will include the use of new cleaning supplies, efficient operating procedures in the kitchen and non-disposable food packaging.

"Our first initiative is to promote reusable food and drink containers," said an announcement to the BHS community posted by the Green Committee.

Ann Johnson, Director of Food Services for Brookline Public Schools, said the equipment in the cafeteria will be replaced with more eco-friendly machines. Washing machines that have not yet been replaced will be used less to conserve water.

An auditor will come to BHS to see if people use reusable plates and flatware.

Johnson has been trying to make the cafeteria more eco-friendly since she took the job two years ago. She said the cafeteria tried using reusable plates in 2006 but ran into several setbacks.

"Unfortunately, it took less than two months for 100 plates to disappear from the cafeteria," she said.

Johnson believes the cafeteria will lose fewer plates this time, due to the new policy preventing eating in the halls.

The cafeteria also plans to discontinue serving food on plastic and Styrofoam trays and plates.

"This action will reduce the cafeteria's waste immensely as well as reduce our consumption of cardboard and Styrofoam, which harms the environment," said senior SAJE member Katie Ullmann.

However some things won't change immediately. Bagels and pizza will still be served on paper plates. Johnson said the cafeteria will transition to reusable silverware after students have become accustomed to reusable plates and cups.

Students will also have the choice of using reusable plates or the old disposable materials.

This option will be permanent. However the staff is hoping that students and faculty members alike will make the choice to use the reusable items.

Johnson said the transition to reusable plates and energy-efficient machines will not make the cafeteria drastically more eco-friendly: the Green Café project is just the beginning. According to Johnson, the cafeteria and BHS are a long way from reaching their goal of becoming greener.

"I don't think you can put a start or end date to this activity," Johnson said. "It is a constant evolution."

Legislature asks that club change name, mission statement

By Matthew Rizman
News Editor

After being rejected for school funding by the Student Legislature, Students of Color, the SWS minority support group, is debating the importance of three words before returning to meet with Student Legislature on Jan. 22.

Incorporating the words "everyone is welcome" in the group's mission statement will likely get SOC's proposal for club funding accepted.

Student Legislature rejected the group's initial funding proposal because they were concerned the current title did not explicitly include all students at BHS. According to senior Student Legislature member senior Siddharth Jain, the title "Students of Color" made it seem like the club is exclusively for colored people.

Some SOC members said they felt they were being treated unfairly by Student Legislature, as other groups did not have to include "everyone is welcome" in their mission statement. Chief Justice of Judiciary senior AJ Fajnzylber met with Student Legislature adviser and math teacher Joshwa Paris on Jan. 9 and pointed out that other groups had not been asked to explicitly include all members in the past.

Many members of SOC are not interested in changing their mission statement. They believe the phrase "everyone is welcome" violates the group's principle.

"Tons of white people want to come in and talk about race," faculty adviser and SWS English teacher Abby Erdmann said to her group. "They aren't who I want {in SOC}."

SOC, which has met once a week in a fourth floor classroom for eight years, does not exclude all white people from participation; at the group's Jan. 8 meeting, three of the 11 students present were white, as is Erdmann. But members claimed that their group's intent, to provide a safe place for minority students to share their experiences in a predominantly white high school, would be undermined by allowing all white people to join.

Senior Cole Lanier, a white SOC member, said at the meeting that "having more whites than students of color would lose purpose and potency."

Hispanic member senior Krysten Fernandez described Lanier as a "white ally" and said, "He's like another person of color in my mind."

"Obviously, he can't totally relate," she added, "but he's on the same page."

Erdmann described a "white ally" as a white person who works to combat racism. SOC members proposed the addition of the phrase "white allies are welcome" to their mission statement, but Student Legislature did not accept, some members said.

Erdmann's application for club funding stated that SOC's purpose is "to provide a safe place for discussion about race, to explore experiences students of color have and to brainstorm responses to challenges students of color face."

A club is eligible to apply for funding two years after its inception. Student legislature allots funding to clubs on a case-by-case basis.

Erdmann said she had intended to use the money to take her students to the play ARTiculation, which features three BHS alumni.

LETTERS FROM THE EDITORS

This Nov. 4 a historic election will occur. At stake is the United States' domestic future and the future of the international world. This is the future we will inherit.

We have provided you with a center spread (pages 12 and 13) that highlights the election issues and provides examples of involved students. We've published articles by seniors Cole Lanier and Emily Sampson (page 7) where they share their political beliefs. But there's a lot we've left out.

So I challenge you to educate yourselves on the candidates and issues. Go online, read the news, ask someone knowledgable. And if you prefer a candidate, go out and campaign for them. People accuse our generation of not being involved. Let's prove them wrong.

Until next time,
Jacob

The hardest part of producing a newspaper is getting people to meet deadlines. Just as hard is meeting the deadlines yourself. Miss one deadline and the pressure is on full-throttle.

But journalism isn't the only place where people are forced to meet deadlines. Life is filled with deadlines, and as a senior I am finding that my life is increasingly becoming all about them: Gov. project due Oct. 23, early decision application due Nov. 15, senior picture and quote due Nov. 3, and the list goes on.

With deadlines around every corner, it's hard not to let them take over your life and get swept up in the pressure and stress that they generate. But let me tell you a secret: this paper in your hands came out past deadline, and it's still great (in my opinion, anyway).

Sometimes you just need to step back from deadlines and take a breather. So put down your history textbook or close out of that CommonApp website and take a few minutes to relax and read The Sagamore. We may not always meet every deadline, but I bet we're more enjoyable than studying for that history test or doing college applications. Go on, you deserve the break.

Always,
Rebecca

STEREOTYPES

The Sagamore staff: overachievers distinguished from the rest of the student body by their tape recorders and ear for news. Can be found in Room 101 during lunch, before and after school and during free blocks.

This is only one of the many examples of high school stereotypes.

At the beginning of the year, The Sagamore staff found a letter of complaint posted around the school about the definition of South Brookline, or "Sobro" that was printed in the freshman issue. The freshman issue was distributed on the first day of the freshman school year and therefore was not seen by the rest of the school, for whom school starts a day later.

The definition, which referenced lacrosse, partying and polo shirts, was among various other terms we defined, such as Mo4B. We hoped the definitions might give nervous freshman a sense of the new student body while being humorous at the same time. The writer of the complaint letter criticized our definition for being too stereotypical.

We recognize that high school stereotypes are a part of high school culture and can be funny if their inaccuracy is taken into account. That, however, is not a way to defend them, and we apologize for their appearance in our paper. No one likes to be put in a group where they are not recognized as an individual, for there is little truth in a label.

Students have learned first-hand of the danger of defining someone from afar, which makes it that much easier to judge him or her. However, it cannot be denied that stereotyping, a reassuring way to distinguish between "us" and "them" and therefore create an order we can recognize, is a major part of the way students deal with high school. If peers can assume that "those girls" are airheads or "those jocks" are immature, they can be more comfortable in knowing or not knowing them.

We as students use high school stereotypes all the time, but we must also remember how extreme, and therefore inaccurate, they can be.

High school students have made few of the major decisions that will classify them later in life, such as their profession or home city. They therefore feel the need to join clubs, take classes or play sports if only to have an answer when someone asks the dreaded question of "well, what are you interested in?"

A student without an answer may feel as though he or she does not belong in a high school culture.

There is a pressure to be part of a recognizable group when one has not fully developed an individual identity. Someone can join the lacrosse team and know they are part of a high school subculture, which in turn sets itself apart from other high school subcultures. We feel the need to be stereotyped as much as we feel the need to stereotype.

Freshmen enter the school without any of the security that comes with knowing exactly where each of their classmates, some of whom they have known for nine years, lies in the high school social structure.

In giving them some commonly used stereotypes, we hoped to comfort them with the realization that it is just as easy to thoughtlessly categorize high school students as it was in middle school.

However, stereotyping is exactly that: thoughtless. Stereotypes are nothing more than a label based on a little bit of truth, exaggerated to the extreme. Although they can be funny at their core, they are nothing more than an ignorant way to judge.

COURSE OPTIONS

When English Department Chair Mary Burchenal began teaching at Brookline High School in 1990, the English curriculum was drastically different from what it is now.

In 1990, sophomores and juniors were allowed to choose from a variety of half-year English electives. The classes were integrated between the two grade levels and students would take a writing elective for half the year and a reading elective for the other half.

Today, however, BHS students cannot choose the topics of their English courses until their senior year. In fact, prior to senior year, students are more or less told what courses to take in each subject. So when senior year comes around and students are faced with a multitude of course options they have never been offered before, the problem often becomes that they have too many classes they are interested in and not enough space in their schedule.

Many students are not as interested in the classes they are required to take prior to senior year. Should they then be allowed to choose from more courses earlier in their high school career?

It is true that BHS needs to mandate some classes in each subject area to provide students with basic knowledge that they will need, both for standardized tests and for life after high school. Doing so also allows students to potentially develop interest in areas they may not have studied otherwise.

However, it is conceivable that by the end of sophomore year, students have explored enough areas and learned enough basic information to have at least some options for courses by their junior year.

Allowing students a wider variety of courses would allow them to take subjects they are more passionate about.

When they are not interested in what they are learning, students have little motivation to do their work other than to get good grades. But students who are interested in their classes do better in them because they have a personal interest in learning the material.

BHS should cater to the philosophy that students should do their work more for the sake of learning and gaining knowledge than for getting good grades. The school can do this by offering students more choices of courses they are interested in learning about.

The BHS handbook indicates that this is what the school aims to do. According to the handbook, one of BHS' institutional goals is "to deliver instruction which blends the traditional and the innovative, emphasizing both the acquisition of knowledge and its application."

BHS not only prepares students academically, but it prepares them for all aspects of life after high school. Students need to develop independence and responsibility; by the time students reach college, they will have hundreds of courses to choose from.

If students were offered a wider variety of courses to choose from during their junior year as well as their senior year, students would have practice in choosing their classes so that they would not get as overwhelmed in college.

Additionally, offering more courses earlier would allow students to take more courses that they are passionate about.

This would help students pursue subjects that interest them in more depth if they so choose, and at the very least it would make high school students enjoy high school a little more.

Freshman physics a social learning opportunity

By David Goroff
Photography Manager

When I went to see my guidance counselor over the summer to ask about rearranging my schedule, she asked if I, as a junior, would mind being in a freshman physics class.

I had gone to school for nine years overseas and had taken biology my freshman year, so I had to find a way to fit physics into my schedule. At the time that I agreed, I never could have imagined it would be as entertaining and enlightening an experience as I now realize it has been.

I have learned boatloads in freshman physics, and very, very little of it has been physics. Instead I find myself learning about my classmates, and freshmen in general.

First and foremost, I learned that freshmen are immature. I had always thought that upperclassman just said that to establish their seniority. Turns out, it really is true. The guy, or rather kid, who sits next to me often plays with a Transformer, finger skateboard or ball under our desk (its no surprise he has a C).

The same kid's favorite mid-long-block activity is taking something of mine and throwing it across the room (and his second favorite is to stab me with a pen).

Another kid, who sits on my right, once literally ate my schedule – the entire piece of paper – simply because he felt like it. Another sign of their immaturity is that, baring three exceptions, the class has split itself into boys on the left and girls on the right.

Second, I learned that freshmen ask lots of questions. And they don't limit themselves to questions for Mr. Love, our teacher. Every time I turn around someone is asking me about physics (and I usually can't answer), or about high school in general. Questions range from "You take chemistry next year right?" to "Have you ever smoked weed and drank a beer at the same time?" (I didn't grace that question with a response).

But it was through these types of questions that I realized the most important thing about the class, which is that freshman physics isn't all about learning physics – it's about freshman getting on their feet, and learning how to learn. At the start of the year the question "Should we be writing this down?" was all the rage, but by now they have realized that the answer is most always yes.

Even more important than 'learning how to learn' is that freshman are able to grow into themselves. The boy who sits to the left of me is undisputedly the smartest kid in the class. At the beginning of the year people would ask him questions, and if he responded at all it would be quietly and without confidence.

But as the year progressed, he began to grow into his intelligence and now regularly and with great enthusiasm answers questions or sings out explanations to problems. The lasting impact of this class will not be to have taught him any physics, but rather to have given him confidence in his intellect.

Essentially, freshman physics is about just that – allowing the game playing, pencil throwing, stupid question asking, paper eating, immature kids to grow into thougtful, confident students.

THE AUDACITY OF ANNA

Barack Obama is now perhaps the most important person in the United States of America. Suppose a change in fate: three months ago, things had turned out differently on election night. The market had not crashed, the economy were only on the minds of economists and everyone's focus was on national security like it was in 2004. Suppose this change in fate led Senator John McCain to the White House.

The question on my mind is: if that had been the case, would the BHS administration still have sacrificed precious class time to watch the innauguration. The answer is absolutely not. The idea of merging the MLK assembly and the swearing of John McCain into office sounds funny to me because it would never happen. Would the entirety of the school even know that it was happening?

I hate to be "that guy" who brings down everyone's Jan. 20 high, but I'm sick of the administration and faculty at our school having such an apparent political agenda. A typical complaint of a Brookline High education is that students leave high school without realizing that their love for the Democratic Party consists of nothing more than canned phrases and 50 dollars worth of Obama/Biden apparel. How do these students end up thinking about politics the way they do?

Sure, blame the parents, but they aren't being paid to give students an objective education. Teachers, it's hard to think of you as an unbiased source when I'm so distracted by the shiny Obama pin you have secured to your lapel. And it's hard to take the right side seriously when some teachers can't explain unregulated capitalism's benefits without throwing in jokes about how inherently wrong it is.

What's the big deal if a teacher wants to post a hilarious anti-Bush Zippy cartoon in their workspace for the entertainment and amusement of their colleagues? Well, when an unassuming student walks into the history office and sees three anti-Bush cartoons, it feeds the vicious beast that is the Brookline liberal attitude.

Faculty, I realize it's nearly impossible to not let the occasional comment slip, but you must remember that your word is law to quite a few impressionable students who absorb your opinions like a sponge.

Let's be honest, many teachers are largely responsible for this gaping hole in a BHS education. And students: don't march in the liberal army one more day without seeking a full understanding of both sides of the argument. One-sidedness is responsible for many terrible things in this world, and you're not exempt. So go home tonight and Wikipedia "Republican Party;" you might find something you like there. You might even find that deep down inside you've always been a righty. If so, don't worry about it; the least it will do is make you more interesting.

HPV vaccine should be mandatory

By Sophie Putka
Arts Editor

"Did you get it yet?"

"Oh yeah, I just got my first one yesterday."

"I already got all of them."

SAT scores? Pokemon cards? This exchange between high-schoolers could happen under any number of circumstances. Nowadays, one of them could be the vaccination for HPV, or Human Papilloma Virus, a widely available drug distributed in three shots to girls between the ages of 9 and 25. With its increased availability, this type of conversation should become more frequent in the future.

According to studies, HPV is the most common sexually transmitted disease in the U.S. HPV vaccines, now available to the public in the forms of drugs Gardasil and Cervarix, protect against two strains of HPV, both of which together cause 70 percent of cervical cancers. Organizations including the National Cancer Institute and the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention are calling for the mandatory vaccination of middle school girls. A few states are considering adding the vaccine to the list of required shots for school enrollment.

However, groups including the Family Research Council and Focus on the Family are opposed to mandatory HPV vaccinations. One of the problems cited with the distribution of the vaccine is that it promotes sexual promiscuity.

This claim isn't true, and cannot be proven. Parents who stress abstinence to prevent sexually transmitted diseases neglect the fact that their children may eventually rebel. It is smartest to create as much safety as possible for when that time comes. Saying that a shot which prevents a sexually transmitted disease promotes younger girls engagement in sexual activities is the same as saying that encouraging the use of helmets will cause more reckless and destructive biking.

According to the Center for Disease Control and Prevention, the preventative vaccines are nearly 100 percent effective in preventing the most harmful strains of HPV. HPV is responsible for nearly all cases of cervical cancer, which kills about 233,000 people per year worldwide. HPV is the most widely spread sexually transmitted disease, and 80 percent of women will get some form of HPV before the age of 50, according to Science Daily. Going to the doctor for a shot is a small precaution compared to the pain and damage that can be caused by contracting HPV, and possibly cervical cancer.

Some parents may be uncomfortable answering their daughter's questions about the STD-preventing vaccine. Parents or other adult figures may say girls in sixth grade are too young to be thinking about sex. But most children get some kind of sex education in fifth grade. If parents present the shot to their daughters as a precaution that will keep them from getting sick, they need not be embarrassed. And even if they are, it is a small price to pay to ensure good health.

Many state legislatures and families support the widespread use of the vaccine, but oppose a state mandate to require it for school enrollment. Parents insist on having the right to choose. But it is not enough to have some people vaccinated. The most effective way to control and even eliminate a disease is to have everyone inoculated against it.

Mandatory vaccination also increases the number of families that have access to it. Some parents may not know about the vaccine or may not have the means to obtain it unless it is distributed at schools or required by doctors and state governments. The set of three shots costs about $360. If the shots were voluntary, some families' health care plans would not cover them, and some families that do not have health care might not be able to afford them. But if the vaccine was required for school entry, schools and government would have an incentive to cover the costs.

So if your doctor hasn't brought up the HPV shot yet, ask. Encourage your parents to support mandatory vaccination, let your sister or your cousin know. Like smallpox, measles or polio, a simple choice could help drastically reduce and even get rid of a harmful and destructive disease.

Mosaic to change name at end of year

Photos by Rebecca Coven

Mosaic goes through a dynamic routine, pumping up the crowd at the 2008 pep rally before the Powderpuff game.

By Alison Mooradian
Managing Editor

"It's just so upsetting because I love those girls with all my heart. I really, really do," said BHS alumna and Boston University student Sarah Elentukh, of the members of BHS Mosaic Dance Company.

Elentukh is the founder of one of BHS' most prominent dance groups, recently renamed BHS Mosaic Dance Company. She hegan the group in 2004 and called it Mosaic Motion, the name the BHS community is most familiar with.

When Elentukh graduated in 2006, members of the group at that time held a meeting where Elentukh agreed to let them keep the name Mosaic until the group came up with a new one.

"Everybody understood that eventually the name [Mosaic] would have to be returned," said Elentukh.

Two of the people who attended that meeting are currently captains of BHS Mosaic Dance Company: seniors Orly Zamir and Jenny Levine.

Elentukh and Zamir talked this past June ahout Elentukh taking the name Mosaic back to use for her new dance group at Brookline Academy of Dance to avoid confusion between the two Mosaic groups in Brookline. Elentukh asked Zamir again in Sept. when the BHS dance group still hadn't changed the name.

According to Zamir, when she and Levine asked the members of BHS Mosaic whether they wanted to change the name, no one did.

BHS Mosaic Dance Company member and senior Lily Pendery said, "We all want to keep Mosaic."

Co-captain Levine said, "We were all really upset because we're really well established at the high school... It's like Note-A-Fy having to change their name, it's just weird."

When it became clear that neither side wanted to give up the name, Elentukh went to BHS Performing Arts Curriculum Coordinator and dance teacher Lynn Modell for advice.

Said Elentukh, "I went to [Modell] because she has always been a mentor of mine and because she helped me get the group started."

In the beginning of November, Zamir, Levine, Elentukh and dance teachers Modell, Christian Polos and Kathleen Exar held a meeting in the performing arts office to resolve the disagreement. The dance teachers proposed a compromise.

"Ms. Modell thought it would be best if we all met together not so much because Jenny, Orly and I couldn't reach a compromise but just so everybody would know what's going on. It was really calm," said Elentukh.

Levine said of the meeting, "Ms. Modell was just like 'here's the compromise, this is what it's going to be.'"

The compromise allows the BHS dance group to keep the name BHS Mosaic Dance Company until the end of the school year and then they have to change the name to something that won't include Mosaic.

"We're happy about the outcome," said Zamir.

Elentukh said of the outcome, "They're okay with it, I'm okay with it. I would have liked things to be different but I understand why I have to compromise."

According to Levine, the members of BHS Mosaic Dance Company haven't thought about what their new name will be for next year.

Students get a lesson in drama in A Brief Unit

By Charlotte Hough
Arts Editor

On Wednesday, Dec. 10, the BHS freshman play, A Brief Unit on Interdimensional Heroism went up. The play is about a group of students that arrives at school one day to find their teacher replaced by a talking cardboard box. They then go on a fantasy-based adventure into different dimensions.

"It's just completely outlandish and fun," said director Summer Williams. "It's really an exercise in imagination."

In A Brief Unit, all of the roles have face time on stage, giving every cast member opportunity to shine. Williams said that this is one of the main reasons that she chose this play for the freshmen: it gives students just coming to the high school a chance to showcase their talent as actors.

This is typically one goal of the freshman play: to give the younger students a chance to find their niche in the drama scene at BHS.

"Everyone has a nice opportunity to have their moment," said Williams. "It really inspires kids who want to do more to do more with whatever they have."

Freshman Cindy Liberman is a Devotion alumnus who participated in her eighth grade musical last year, Bye Bye Birdie. In A Brief Unit she played Mercedes, who Liberman described as "the sassy one."

She said that in A Brief Unit she has had more opportunity to develop her character than in Bye Bye Birdie, where she only had a minor role in the chorus. She said she did not really get to take the acting as seriously as she does now through her involvement in the freshman play.

Liberman hopes to be a part of more BHS plays in the future, especially comedies. She said that her exposure to the different types of humor of the characters in A Brief Unit has inspired this interest.

Senior Allie Walpert, a production assistant in A Brief Unit, has been involved in BHS drama since her freshman year when she helped out with props for her freshman play, Animal Farm. She has been helping out with BHS drama productions ever since.

"It helped me be part of the drama society because it's difficult to actually [get an acting part] in the plays," said Walpert of her experience in helping out with BHS drama productions.

Junior Laura Morell, the other production assistant for A Brief Unit, was cast in her freshman play, Fahrenheit 451, but quit because of the need to fulfill other obligations. She instead started her BHS acting career by scoring a role in the spring play, Largo Desolato.

Unlike the somewhat easy transition into drama made possible by the freshman play, Morell said of Desolato, "It was difficult because the majority of the cast was upperclassmen and it was throwing me into this play with older people. [I] had to do some uncomfortable things, so that was kind of awkward, but I really enjoyed the experience."

Morell said she also enjoyed being production assistant for A Brief Unit, and was excited for the final product turns out.

"I know what it's like being on stage, and it will be even better seeing them [on stage], achieving this goal that they've set for themselves," she said.

This year ReVisions, BHS's annual variety show, was held in Dance Studio One on Jan. 8-9. The show may have surprised many audience members - it was planned, rehearsed and created completely by students.

Dance teacher Christien Polos, who supervised the show, said, "I love the idea of giving students the space and time to do their own thing. They may be in our classes and in many of the other BHS productions, but for this show we are just there to help in the background."

The dance department has held this event for many years, but the program used to only include dance performances and ran for 30 minutes. In 2003, the Performing Arts department invited other performing arts students to join the program and changed the name from Dance Visions to ReVisions.

This year ReVisions featured performances by Note-a-Fy, Chloe Nasser, Ben Kirsch, Perfect Pitch, Testostatones, BHS Mosaic Dance Co., Claire Winters, Abby Arnold, Livia Celmaster, Jasmin Estrada-Levinson, Chan Kang and Amir Bitran.

Junior Tommy Corcoran, who performed with Testostatones, said, "[In ReVisions] you get to show what you have been working on your own, rather than like, 'this is what I learned in my chorus class,' so it's a way to express people's creativity and their accomplishments as individuals."

Nasser performed in two acts, the first one an acrobatic demonstration with her partner Kirsch and the second one a self-choreographed dance solo.

When asked before the show about her performance with Kirsch, Nasser said, "Partner acrobatics is something very new that not many people have gotten the opportunity to see, so I think everyone will really enjoy the performance."

The performance did, in fact, have the effect that Nasser was expecting from the audience, since the audience could not stop clapping during and after the couple performed. They formed unusual shapes by balancing on one-another's bodies.

Solo acts included Arnold, who performed a song from the musical Grey Gardens, Winters, who did a Scottish dance, and Kang, who played acoustic guitar.

The small dance studio created an atmosphere of intimacy, making it easier to see the students' passion for their creations.

Home, home on the Brookline Hills T-stop

Woodworking class builds house over several years: What next?

By Charlotte Hough
Arts Editor

Between the Unified Arts Building and the Brookline Hills MBTA stop sits a small, unfinished two-story house.

The house is part of a project the students in the Construction Engineering course undertook in 2005, and the class continues to work on it.

The goal of Construction Engineering is to teach students about both the business and the trade aspects of different types of construction through direct experience and real construction projects.

The course has faced some obstacles in achieving this goal during class time, said Arnie Marcus, Career and Technology Education Department Chair. In the past, students in the class worked on improvements for public buildings around Brookline for their live experience.

One of these improvements was on the caretaker's house to the Walnut Hill Cemetery on Grove Street. In the summer of 1992, a group of paid BHS students worked eight hours a day, six days a week on this house.

It was a win-win situation for both the town and the program because it gave the town of Brookline a spending break and gave the students some quality hands-on experience. However, it was only really good as a summer project.

During the school year, with a 10-minute commute to the construction sites, students could never get enough work done in the 50-minute block. Just four weekly classes of this length was simply not enough time. So program leaders, including Marcus, sought a solution and found one. They extended the allotted time from four blocks a week to eight, paired up like lab blocks. This implemented time change is still in place.

Halfway through the 2004-2005 school year, Construction Engineering teacher Peter Lee, who also teaches an Architectural Design class, gave one of his architecture students a new project.

"He just flopped the project on my lap," said former Architectural Design student Dan Prager, '07. "He told me he wanted me to design a simple building that was 20 feet by 24 feet and two stories."

For the rest of the semester, Prager worked with Lee on designing the house, though at that point he had no idea that it was going to be built. Lee and Prager finalized plans for the house at the beginning of Prager's junior year and went to the town of Brookline to get a building permit. Construction Engineering students began building the house in late September of 2005.

The house project gave Prager something bigger to work on than he ever had for Lee's class. In the past, he had designed some other small things for the class to build, and he designed another house, but it was never built.

"It was extremely exciting," said Prager. "I mean, there I was – sixteen, and I was already designing a house, one that was actually going to get built. It was huge."

The project's location also solved the original time problem that had made it hard for Construction Engineering students to get hands-on experience during class time.

The house has been under construction for two years and is in its final stages, said teacher Peter Lee. The exterior is finished and students are currently working on cabinets for the kitchen.

Students hope to sell the house, which would need to go through a bidding process through the town of Brookline. They have received no offers as of now, but Marcus has hope that they will in the future.

According to the potential buyer's preference, the class would finish the interior of the house or leave it as is, said Marcus. It would then be put onto a flatbed truck and transported to a permanent location, where it could finally become a home.

WORKING THE WIRE

A LOOK AT THE SCULPTURE CLASS

By Alexa Vasios
Sports Editor

To one side of the room, an old iMac, completely stripped of its inner parts, houses a small robot made of wire surrounded by recycled computer bits and Christmas lights. This is only one of the pieces made out of recycled materials in the BHS sculpture class.

However, before the students can progress to using recycled materials, they must start with the basics. For the first two weeks of the course, taught by Eric Latimer, the students are instructed to work exclusively with wire.

"We talk about how wire can be used for future types of sculptures. It is the skeleton that will give your sculpture its strength," said Latimer.

He said that many students begin the year by working with a wire base to create a person. According to Latimer, first attempts will often consist of feet that are too small or legs that do not contain enough wire to support the body. However, after their second attempt, Latimer said most students finally understand what they need to do in order to get the person to stand, adding more wire where it is needed.

"It's really hard making a human or something that stands on two legs because you have to have most of the weight on the legs and not make it too top heavy," said Latimer.

The first two weeks of the sculpture class have deadlines and are geared towards acquainting the students with the foundations of sculpture making. However, Latimer explained that after those two weeks, the students are allowed a lot of creative freedom.

"I don't like to impose a strict deadline and say 'okay, in a week's time you must have this piece of work done.' I don't think creativity works that way," said Latimer.

Said junior Peter Wise, "The class is fun because it's really unique and really open. [Latimer] just kind of lets us make whatever we want to make."

If a student reaches a dead end while working on a piece or needs to take a break in order to come at the piece with fresh eyes, that student is allowed to put aside the unfinished sculpture and begin creating something new.

Latimer also emphasizes that it is okay to make mistakes.

"They're learning from their experiences, and that is a wonderful thing to witness as a teacher... I think they really are understanding what it means to engage and persist and never really quit," said Latimer.

While many students enter the class unsure of their skills and lacking confidence in their abilities, after those pivotal first two weeks, they begin to understand sculpting better and can then create pieces that exceed their expectations.

This year's RENT

The non-vocal stars of RENT

By Rose LaPlante
Staff Writer

As you listened to the rock-opera songs in RENT: School Edition, this year's winter musical, you knew the music mattered: the accompaniment continued throughout the entire show with barely a pause.

But this year, instead of the typically larger pit-band used in plays, there were only four instruments. The band, directed by Carolyn Castellano, was composed of sophomore Eli Guterman on bass, junior Oliver Monaco on guitar, senior Ethan Petuchowski on drums and three professionals on keyboard.

Director Kyle Greene said the orchestra's size is specified on the music score of RENT: School Edition. The script says the show only needs four musicians.

Guterman chose to do the band because he said, "Carolyn asked me to play and I thought it would be fun." He said that he did not feel he needed to compensate for the small number of musicans.

"All the pieces were originally written for [a] small ensemble," he said.

However, Greene said, "although the band is smaller then usual, they produce the same, if not more, volume as any other orchestra."

Because of the small size of the band, Greene gave each of them a microphone.

The intensity of the band may have also challenged the cast members themselves.

"With an entire score of rock and roll, singing over the band of RENT: School Edition is a challenge for our actors, who wear individual body microphones for their solos," said Greene.

Regardless of technology or volume, the accompaniment in RENT may be more than just assistance. As Petuchowski said, "the music is the play."

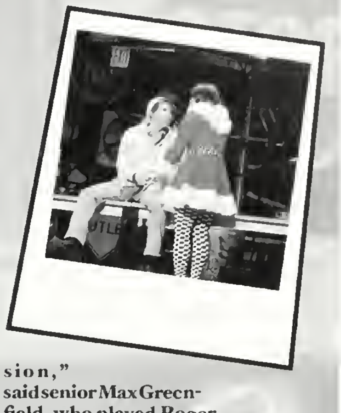
Kyle Greene:the man in charge

By Sarah Nalven
Managing Editor



Director Kyle Greene is an expert on RENT.

"I'm embarrassed to admit that when I was in high school RENT opened, and I actually saw the show sixteen times," said Greene. A freelance director and choreographer who works all over Boston and New England, Greene broke the eleven-show dynasty of BHS dance teacher and former musical director Christien Polos this year with his direction of RENT: School Edition.

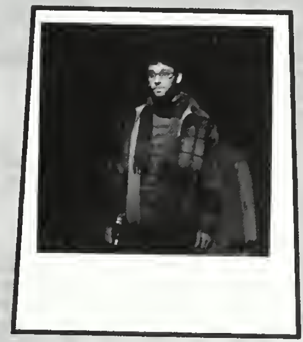
Greene has worked in theatre for about 10 years, directing, choreographing and working on the sets of almost 30 productions. He also danced in the Broadway production of Beauty and the Beast at just 19 years old. Before coming to Brookline, Greene simultaneously directed Gypsy at Milton High School and Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat in Weston.

"To fill Mr. Polos's shoes was not an easy thing," said Performing Arts Department Chair Lynn Modell.

But she said, "Kyle just seemed very confident, and I called his references and people spoke very highly of him."

Greene was hired in the spring of 2008 after Christien Polos stepped down from the job.

"We thought it was great to have a fresh perspective and a new director with a new vision," said senior Max Greenfield, who played Roger.



Freshman Anne Martland, who played Mimi, said "He was really professional and he treated us like adults... and I feel like that made us try really hard."

"He had a distinct image of what he wanted to see," said senior Ezra Plancon, who played Angel. "So that whole look you saw on stage, Kyle really crafted that from the ground up."

Greene could not have done it alone however. Anita Fortini, who is a teacher's aid at BHS during the day, served as the assistant director and "as an extra set of eyes and ears for the production," said Greene.

Rachael Ziering, who student teaches with with BHS Choral Director Michael Driscoll during the day, was the vocal director.

"She and Kyle were definitely a good team," said Greenfield. "They complemented each other."

The directors made sure rehearsal ran smoothly. Said Greenfield, "There was no dilly-dallying. They were very organized."

Greene's expertise in theatre and in the RENT itself made for a smooth-running, eye-catching, standing ovation-worthy production.

Greene plans to direct BHS's winter musical again next year.

Sex, drugs and AIDS: oh my?

By Sarah Nalven
Managing Editor

When RENT became available this year for high school production after a 12-year run on Broadway, BHS was one of approximately 40 schools around the country that grabbed the opportunity to perform the toned-down "student edition."

In some communities, the decision to perform a musical about artists living a life permeated with sex, drugs and AIDS, even if edited for the high school stage, drew strong opposition. In Texas, West Virginia and California, high school productions were cancelled.

But at BHS, the controversial material was embraced. In fact, it is not even clear if the student edition was required to bring RENT to the BHS stage.

"People thought that it was going to be really watered down and censored because it was the school edition," said freshman Anne Martland, who played Mimi. "But I thought it was cool that we could basically do the Broadway version."

The adaptation remains largely true to the original script. The main changes include the elimination of some profane language -- "make a connection" for "hold an erection," "mucho medication" for "much masturbation" -- and the deletion of the song "Contact," which has overtly sexual lyrics. But according to director Kyle Greene, "the integrity of the show was not affected by the changes that were made."

Performing Arts Department Chair Lynn Modell is not surprised that there was no controversy at BHS and did not expect any.

"If we think that the material is controversial or that there will be a response from the community that we want to be prepared for, certainly there is a conversation with the coordinator, and sometimes we involve Dr. Weintraub," she said.

But with RENT, no such conversation took place.

"I just trusted that the material would be suitable for high school audiences," said Modell.

The cast also had no problem with the material.

"The subject matter was handled and responded to just like any other show would have been," said Greene. "The fact that there were homosexual relationships and drug issues and many issues that students of any age at any school don't really live by, those were all handled just as artistically as any other show would have been."

Senior Channa Gilbert, who played Maureen, added, "I think everyone who had a role doing something like kissing a member of the same sex or doing some risqué dance down a pole, they were comfortable. And when those actors are comfortable it makes people around them comfortable."

When Music Theater International, the theatrical licensing agency that owns the rights to RENT: School Edition, asked a school in Kenosha, WI to perform the world premiere, all kisses were replaced with hugs and other gestures. In BHS's production, however, several kisses took place, including two by homosexual couples.

"For Brookline, I think we probably could have gotten away with some changes having not been made," said Greene, "but to be sensitive to students, I think they did a really nice job adapting the show to be accessible to students all over America."

Provocative subject matter, such as that of RENT, is nothing new to BHS's Drama department. According to Modell, "there is a history of controversial material" at BHS.

About 15 years ago, then Performing Arts department chair Iain Ryrie directed a piece about AIDS. Six years ago, drama teacher Mary Mastandrea put on Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice, whose depiction of the Jewish title character is sometimes interpreted as derogatory. She brought in a panel to discuss anti-Semitism after the show.

"In our school, we've done Ragtime where we've said the N-word and A Chorus Line where there were multiple swears [and other mature content]," acknowledged Gilbert, who has participated in the BHS musical for the past four years.

"In Brookline, we're really lucky because we all already have pretty good understandings of issues that might not be so openly talked about in other communities," she said.

Said Modell, "When people see a production like RENT that addresses the topics that it addresses, I think it inspires conversation."

"It's a pretty special community," she continued. "We're a community that embraces diversity of all kinds."

Dear Class of 2009,

I have commented in the past about how life is a do-it-yourself project and that you are participating in building your house. Well, you have completed the foundation by earning your high school diploma. An accomplishment that you will treasure for the rest of your life. More importantly, I want you to know that you are not done yet and your years of post-secondary should be used to complete the house you started building twelve years ago. I am proud of you and your achievements and wish you well in your future endeavors.

The Sound of Music
The hills are alive with the sound of music
With songs they have sung for a thousand years
The hills fill my heart with the sound of music
My heart wants to sing every song it hears

My heart wants to beat like the wings of the birds that rise from the lake to the trees
My heart wants to sigh like a chime that flies from a church on a breeze
To laugh like a brook when it trips and falls over stones on its way
To sing through the night like a lark who is learning to pray

I go to the hills when my heart is lonely
I know I will hear what I've heard before
My heart will be blessed with the sound of music
And I'll sing once more

I'm ready for the world ...

I hope the world is ready for me!

Heather,
We love your spontaneity and style. Take them with you wherever you go!

Sometimes

Sometimes things don't go, after all,
from bad to worse. Some years, muscatel faces down frost; green thrives; the crops don't fail, sometimes a man aims high, and all goes well.
A people sometimes will step back from war;
elect an honest man; decide they care enough, that they cant leave some stranger poor.
Some men become what they were born for.
Sometimes our best efforts do not go amiss; sometimes we do as we meant to.
The sun will sometimes melt a field of sorrow that seemed hard frozen; may it happen for you.

--Sheenagh Pugh

Cole, Some people become what they were born for. We love you beyond words.

China Exchange

2008-2009

BROOKLINE HIGH SCHOOL -GAO XIN NO 1 HIGH SCHOOL

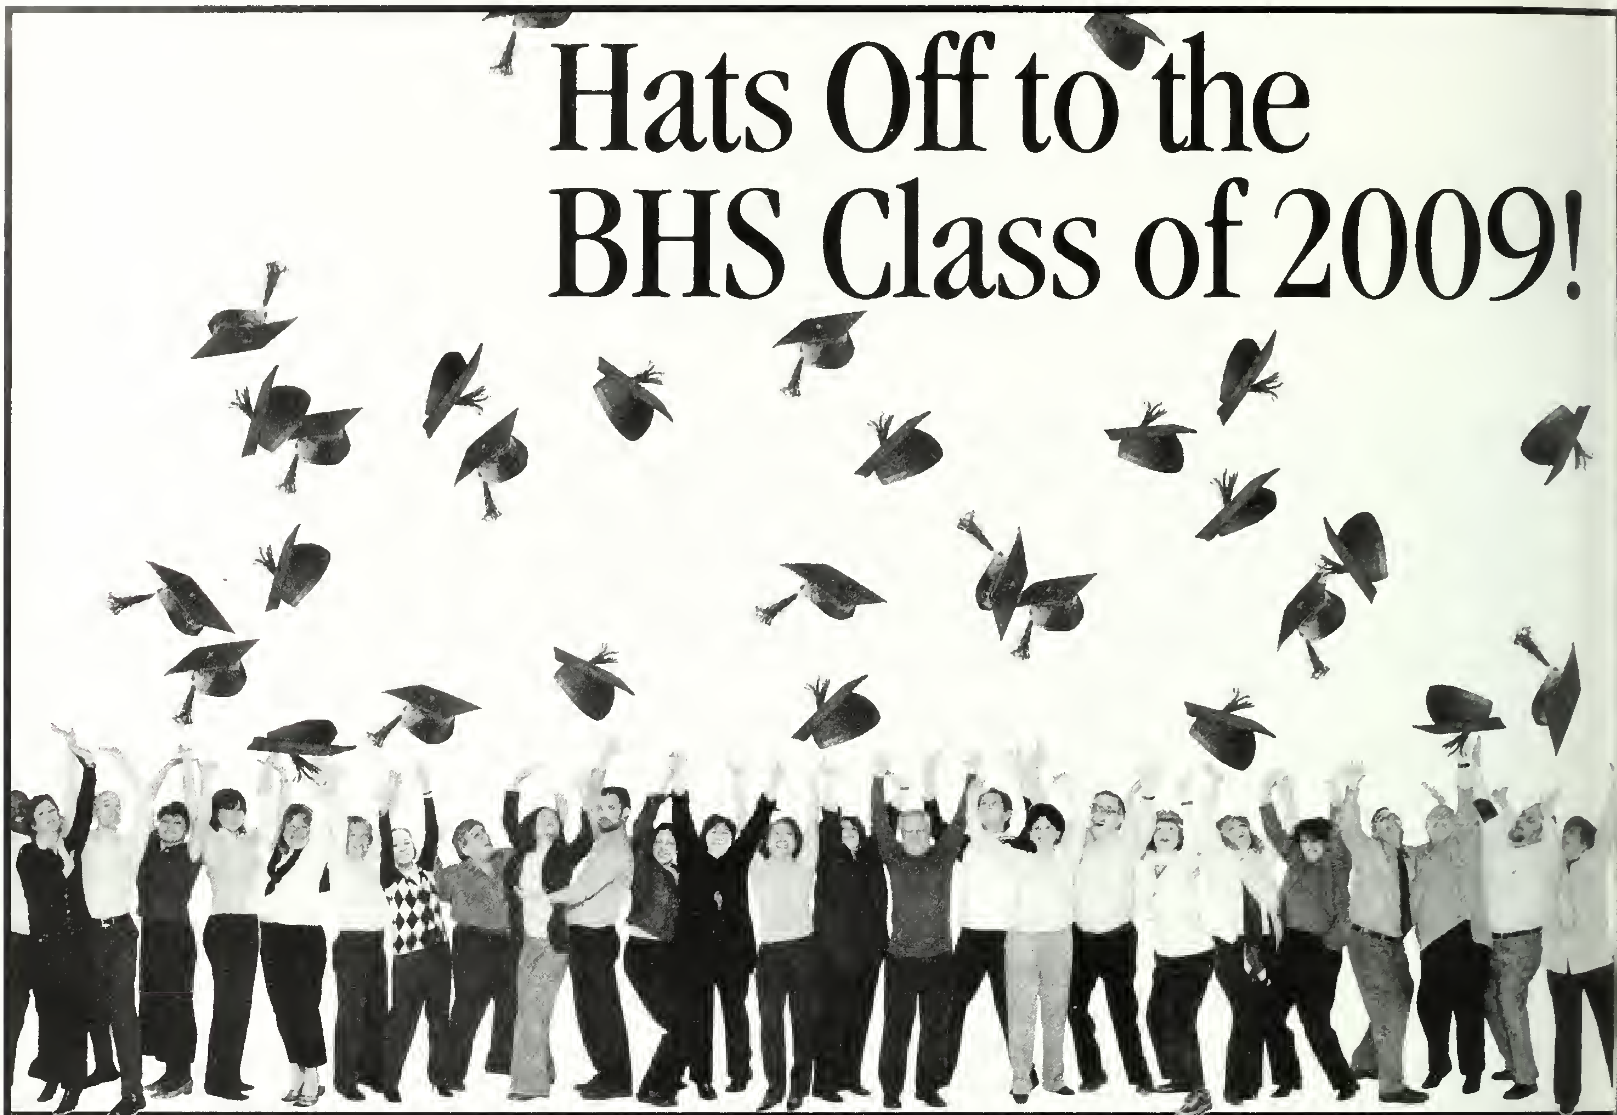
Brookline is into its tenth year of cultural and educational exchange with its sister city of Xi'an, China. Strictly speaking, the exchange program is centered in the high schools – BHS and the Xi'an's Gao Xin No. 1 High School.

Each fall semester, from around September 1 until the end of January eight students (all tenth graders) and one teacher arrive from China to live and learn in Brookline. Nine homes take in the members of the visiting Gao Xin group. The experience of hosting is alternatively hilarious and worrisome; certainly unforgettable and invaluable for all involved.

In February, around the Chinese New Year, both groups travel to China. Our own BHS students start their adventure in Xi'an. Students are immersed in the language, culture, forging new friendships and widening horizons. Every morning they participate in regular classes. In the afternoon they follow a schedule in Modern Chinese History, Language, Literature and Chinese arts and crafts with our own teacher fromBrookline. The four+ months culminate in a trip the group takes together to the region of their choice in China.

The program's network of students, teachers, hosts and supporters has grown at a remarkable pace. When a student with family enters this network, they can count on broad support and can delight in being part of a deeply moving history between two school, two cities, two countries!

Hats Off to the BHS Class of 2009!



RESIDENT EXPERTS

When you were a child, wearing hats was a way to dress up like your heroes: baseball stars, princesses, police officers and cowboys. Now, as young men and women looking ahead to the adventures that life holds, perhaps you'll try many hats on for size. Whether it be that of a teacher, doctor, dot com entrepreneur, musician, or heir to the family business, we wish for each of you a hat that fits perfectly, one that you can wear with integrity throughout your life.

Personal, unchangeable symbolism."

"When I answered questions about what I was doing, they said they didn't want to hear it...They said I was lying, all the while chipping in that what I believed in was wrong, that I had some real problems with my brain, that was in a ton of trouble."

"I build no system. I ask an end to privilege, the abolition of slavery, equality of rights, and the reign of law. Justice, nothing else. That is the alpha and omega of my argument."
-Pierre-Jospeh Proudhon

"As long as people will shed the blood of innocent creatures there can be no peace, no liberty, no harmony between people. Slaughter and justice cannot dwell together."
